Prologue to the Comedy of Errors

Craig Kurtz

ANTIPHOLUS:

Who wants a lackey that is smart,
he'll short-change you right from the start;
you send him erranding, and he'd steal all the best scenes, guaranteed;
what if he was crafty Jodlet who got to woo Don John's coquette?¹
consider Warner, the servant, who got rich, as well Millisent;²
with such a rogue as Jeremy, Truewit was a non-entity;³
this will not do; a lackey must be dull enough to merit trust; if he's too clever, faith, he will command the top place on the bill.

DROMIO:

Who wants a master that is smart,
you'll off to Tyburn in a cart;
the Pit may like someone noble,
but they're too brisk with the cudgel;
ye gallants prefer heroes deft
as they prevent their servants' theft;
ye swells may chouse dames to make nice, but view askance my galliardise;⁴
a master who possesses brains outwits his Bubble, just like Staines;⁵
forsooth, there's knav'ry in all trades, but gents pluck the best escapades;⁶
it's beggarly, a lackey's lot, a smart master cannot be taught.

1. William Davenant, The Man's The Master.
2. John Dryden, Sir Martin Mar-All.
3. Ben Jonson, The Alchemist.
4. Peter Bellon, The Mock Duellist, in which the valet Champagne explains his thievery of his masters' wares as an expression of French servants' punctilio.
5. John Cooke, Greene's Tu Quoque.

6. John Tatham (attributed), Knavery In All Trades, in which the defalcations of merchants' apprentices are outrivalled by those of gentlemen seducing merchants' wives.
