Abstract:

It is often said that men and women belong from two different planets, a thought also shared by the title of John Gray's book Men Are from Mars, Women Are from Venus. These planets are not just metaphorical representation, a visage to envelop self-importance but in actual sense, it is to represent dependence and interdependence in the social fabric. Both 'language' and 'gender' are indispensable components in sociolinguistic discourse. They are used as an apparatus to show the shifts in the social phenomenon. In the studies carried out, gender has been re-modeled or re-conceptualized extensively by contemporary theorist like Judith Butler. Butler connected her performativity theory with post-structuralism, where gender not seen just as a variable but a unitary phenomenon than hitherto. She acknowledged and emphasized on the diversity between male and female speakers; and looked at the shifting relationship between gender and other aspects of identity: and the importance and context in determining how people use language.

Arguing on the above-mentioned assumption, the paper contends that the changing dynamics of male female communication in 'What's App' and how it is performed, negotiated and contested

Introduction

Language is one of the most powerful emblems of social behaviors; it is used to send vital information/ social messages. Human language has changed in the age of globalization, it is no longer tied to stable and resident communities, it moves across the globe, and it changes in the process. The changing dynamics in the usage of language is like the movement in the assemblage or changing patterns in the constellation. Since the 1960s and thereby relationship between gender and language has been the unstinted template for discussion in several streams. Like language, gender too is considered dynamic (Butler) and innately communicative, we construct and enact gender largely through discourses, whereby giving the language a decisive role in doing gender, and helping us in displaying and identifying as gendered subjects. Researchers in various disciplines have different notions for entering and dealing with this subject area, which issues to elaborate on, and, therefore, proliferate their ways in approaching the topic...(Tannen 3-4).

This shifting occurrence in this area of discussion necessitates the need to revise our understanding of linguistic communication. An investigation in male-female conversation style is one such composite exploration in the field of sociolinguistics and related disciplines. One line of investigation has attended to questions about-whether men and women speak differently and delved into the nature of masculinity and femininity and how the difference in ideologies are expressed in language, which includes phonological and lexicon-grammatical differences, for example by examining pronouns or affixes linked with either women or men. English language, here, in this case, is deficient of complex pronoun structure, as sex is only eminent in the third person singular reference, but on the other hand, other languages: for instance, Japanese presents good linguistic assessment in terms of gender marking- women use different pronouns than men.(Talbot 4-5). Also, a lot of investigation has gone into pronunciation habits of each gender to ascertain differences in social dialects. According to the findings by linguists like William Labov and Peter Trudgill, women's speech display more prestige features of Standard English. The vernacular was associated with male speech within the scope of the sociolinguistic findings. (Talbot 18- 19)

Another strand of research discusses the dynamics in the representation of women as inferior to men. These pieces of evidence can be found in our everyday linguistic practices, the asymmetric can be seen in pair of gender differentiated terms such as master and mistress, etc, where we find negative connotation with the female term, or demeaning her to bedmate or mistress, while the male terms means expert or ace, which by and large is either neutral or positive. Another example consists of the use of masculine forms such as he, man or composite words such as mankind, chairman, etc in nonspecific sagacity to in-cooperate women, e.g., all men are created equal (Romaine). Another instance can be seen in marking of the terms and names referring to women and/or the derivation of female terms from male terms, e.g. actor/actress, etc. Such usages illustrate how women have been constructed as 'Other' and how femininity is perceived as masculinity inverted (Romaine). Women have always been considered as 'second sex' and there is always a secondariness attached with it, revealing tight corners and struggle where some see as a natural division while others as a battle but none can claim themselves as right or victorious. Therefore, language and gender are axes around which our world revolves.

Both these strands of research erect and effect reality, mostly in observable ways, but at other times in subtle and indiscernible ways through an array of linguistic practices revealing the ideological construction of MAN i.e. male as nucleus, center or norm. In addition to the grammatical and phonological facet, the difference between gendered subjects is also evident in their use of vocabulary but such occurrences can only be seen in stable, traditionalist societies, with fixed social roles. Due to such sex exclusiveness in vocabulary, it seems as if a different kind of language is used. (Talbot 5-6). American linguist Ann Bodine has brought into light such -sex-exclusive and sex-preferential features in the language. The research of Genderlect is of sex-preferential differentiation, because, unlike grammatical and vocabulary differences, features of male and female speech are not absolute. (Talbot 6)

According to researchers like Deborah Tannen and John Gray, men and women are not just biologically different but they are also genetically incapable to communicate with each other successfully, which they refer as cross –cultural i.e. though we are all naturally alike but we grow up differently because of our class, caste, culture, race, background, geology etc and also sexual characteristics, these dissimilarities effect individual skills in learning and acquiring language extensively. When we penetrate into the threshold of speech we acquire identities and hence with that prejudices too. According to Schmitt (2002), when individuals converse in typical, distinctive ways that might be peculiar to them in certain circumstances, it is termed as their 'idiolect'. While the term, 'dialect' is held in reserve for those distinctive patterns in words and word-order (Lexico-grammar) used by a group of speakers. However, when people share the language in ways, which they share with many other people, it is called 'sociolect'.

In a verbal communication of men and women, pragmatic differences are not just found in grammar, phonology, and vocabulary but can also be seen in actions and body posture that come with speech. Which brings into attention to the question -How do men and women often speak differently? To which Tannen replies-that men and women don't speak different languages; rather, they speak different varieties of the same language which she termed as genderlect. Thus, the word 'genderlect' describe the language of the sexes; it is that variety of language which is not fixed to environment or role but to speakers sexual characteristics. Genderlect aims to detect gender differences in male-female interfacing. As a result, researchers /linguist started analyzing speech with the understanding and supposition that not only the roles are subject of discussion but also the manner of their speech.

But in this scientific milieu, advancement in the area of science and especially technology, new facets have to be considered when measuring the gendered difference in conversation, Computer-mediated communication; therefore, proposes an advanced and composite field to delve into for newer understanding on the subject. Since we are primarily focusing on the production of a gendered identity through language; this novel means to offer a fresh approach to the preceding findings on Genderlect. When analyzing the gendered language used in the electronic environment with regard to the possibility of anonymity, the new medium can, to some extent, provide evidence for the existence of differences in masculine and feminine discourse style.

The aim of this study is to show the shifting dynamics in cross cultural communication by what's app users. The study is based on Deborah Tannen's bestseller: You Just Don't Understand: Men and Women Conversation and will try to answers these questions- Is gendered language merged into us so firmly that we reflect it into the typewritten layout? Whether the shift is challenging the language norm? If yes, what are the intersections and parallels we find in the changing language template? For this study we have taken three groups into consideration: male only, female only and mixed group. We have divided our research into three broad categories: established theories on gender style in conversation, CMC and analysis of what's app conversation in all the three groups. Various findings on this subject went hand in hand with the primal question of the origin of language itself and were examined from multiple lenses including grammatical, phonological and lexical.

1. Genderlect :

“Just as we rarely question our ability to breathe, so we rarely question the habit of dividing human beings into two categories: females and males (Bergvall, Bing and Freed 1 in Tablot 12). Every human being is a unique entity in itself, the aim of Genderlect is to recognize, categorize these unique traits or differences. In fact, the entire study of genderlect is governed by the word ‘difference’, giving way to an array of the question for debate. Linguists advocating ‘difference’ approach asserts that the difference in gendered communication lies in subcultures and their dissimilar communication styles replicate these subcultures. These differences they claim are due to variation in sociolinguistic subcultures i.e. socialization process: family, society, friends, games etc which not just adds to one’s sexual characteristics and behavior and also to language. As observed by Tannen (125)

Culture is simply a network of habits and patterns gleaned from past experiences, and women and men have different past experiences. From the time they were born, they were treated differently, talked to differently, and talk differently as a result.

In this patriarchal system, a major historical slip up by men over the years was also about accidental linguistic supremacy, powerless subjugated by powerful. These dissimilarities are not just seen in men holding higher plateau of social order or on objects but also on language as men see themselves as the creator of language (man-made). Genderlect, a register in the study of sociolinguistic subculture becomes significant and observable with age and these prejudices grow as we assume more clear adult identities But these are an unintentional slip-up and not innate, therefore it can be changed through small changes in our language. Grammarians like Dennis Baron calls language innate, in his book Grammar and Gender says “that women's speech differs from men's is accepted in much the same way that the psychological differences between the sexes are accepted, and because language is perceived as an innate and essential part of our humanity, sex differences in language are treated as natural, genetic, only to be expected and frequently to be reinforced.’ (Baron 55). A great part of linguist fraternity consider men's speech as the norm and describe it as forceful, efficient, authoritative and serious, while women's speech is viewed as unimportant, doubtful, super polite and euphemistic, in short, a divergent from the norm.

Mey (313) has a different approach towards the use of language, which he calls “emancipatory language”, it means, “the use of language does not subscribe to the commonly established prejudices about, and the skewed images of women, (language) will change men way of thinking for women, while it makes women conscious of the importance of language in their lives”. Tannen thus states that genderlect helps in drawing attention towards these varied male female communication patterns and facilitate the interlocutors to find a common ground to negotiate. (Tannen14-17).Linguists’ dealing with such relation believes that problems cropping up in communication are due to existing norms and way of thinking of both partners, they confront existing myths i.e. women speak more than men and try to unearth an explanation of that reality. (Coates 86).

1.1 Genderlect Theories

In 1975, Robin Lakoff, a female professor of linguistics at the University of Berkeley, published Language and Woman’s Place, which prompted the study of language and sociolinguistics and became the first women to bring out the reality of women's language. This theory initiated several other studies on the subsistence and uniqueness of women's language. The list includes researchers like –Don Zimmerman, Dale Spender, Candace West, William O’Barr, Bowman Atkins and Pamela Fishman and also a former student of Lakoff, Deborah Tannen. All these linguists though have submitted different names for male female communication style but they have all recognized similar style in gendered communication pattern: conversation dominance and male interruption, women's use of hedges, tag questions, voice pitch, polite forms, hesitation, intensifiers, frequency of turn, and length of turn, disclaimers etc.

One noteworthy study in this area is by theorist William O’Barr and Bowman Atkins; they performed their analyses on courtroom cases, studying a wide gamut of witnesses’ and examined their speech on ten basic speech differences that Lakoff proposed. With this investigation, they disapproved Lakoff’s theory on ‘women's language’ and identified “powerless language,” in which they proposed differences in language are not necessarily because of gender, but because of powerlessness, relying on authority or supremacy of the participant in the conversation and according to a situation(specific).

But since our study is primarily focused on Tannen You Just Don't Understand: Men and Women in Conversation, her research focuses on interpersonal relationships, men and women interfacing is not right or wrong, superior or inferior—they are just different. Tannen does not look for clues for characteristics of a women's language but gives a fresh take on old questions on male and female styles of communication. Her theory works around “male as norm” belief, which vis a vis served in realizing the existence of an ‘other’ kind of language (for women), as opposed to two separate styles. Tannen considers men and women styles so distinct that she considers cross-gender communication cross-cultural. Men and women, she says, are socially conditioned to use language in different ways for different reasons. This theory has certain advantages in studying and applying to cross-gender communication taking place online these days, which will be discussed in the next part of this study.

Tannen asserts that men use language for Information and in Contest, i.e. to gain status in relations, while women communicate for Intimacy and to build Community i.e. to establish meaningful connections with others. She suggests since they speak in different dialects- she calls them their genderlects. Genderlect theory acknowledges and appreciates the language of opposite sex and achieves mutual respect and understanding (semiotic and sociocultural traditions). Miscommunication occurs when a meta message -- or an individual's interpretation of how a communication was meant -- is "read" by the receiver through his/her communication filter and not through that of the sender (Githens).

Tenets:

- Women seek connection, men seek status.
- Women use rapport talk, men use report talk.
- We speak the same language, but each gender has its own dialect.
- Goal: Mutual respect and understanding.

After a thorough examination of various theories and studies in this area of sociolinguistic; we observed that they are all spiraling up research towards computer mediated communication (CMC). Men and women are carrying over socialized speech characteristics into their online communication, despite what many proponents of CMC are saying to the contrary.

2. Gender and Electronic Discourse: CMC

David Crystal an advocate of Internet Linguistic uses the expression 'global village', he says that language in mediated communication via computer (or any electronic/mobile device for instance in this case study) has a unique dialect of that village (Crystal 6). This particular language used by 'netizens' in their electronic discourses is called Netspeak. Crystal backs the view that the word 'speak' verifies that electronic communication is a combination of both written and spoken form of discourse. The internet is primarily a written form of discourse but it is also inclined towards traditional spoken language (Crystal 18-19).

2.1 Computer Mediated Communication

Computer-Mediated Communication (CMC) is a platform for the creation, receiving and exchanging information using a set of a telecommunication system that helps in encoding, decoding and transmitting of messages. As Crystal puts forth that the Internet is an electronic, global and interactive means and each property submits to the type of language use online (Crystal 2001:24). This interactivity on World Wide Web essentially helps this new form of (language) communication, therefore, speakers or audience must be into consideration when analyzing online discourse. (2001:24). He says:

Speech is typically time-bound, spontaneous, face-to-face, socially interactive, loosely structured, immediately revisable, and prosodically rich. Writing is typically space-bound, contrived, visually decontextualized, factual communicative, elaborately structured, repeatedly revisable, and graphically rich. (Crystal 28)

Furthermore “Digitally mediated communication is identical to neither speech nor writing, but selectively and adaptively displays properties of both.” (Crystal 235) Therefore he lists new model of turn-taking for example in the use of emoticons, hypertext linkage or framing as linguistic aspects associated only with the world of digital communication. (Crystal 229). Netspeak exhibit unique features, it shows that speakers use online language in their everyday discourse as well, changing the entire dynamics of our earlier traditional speech and writing discourse which confirms its linguistic status as a new mixture in language front. The changes noticed by researchers are mainly in vocabulary but nevertheless, these changes are definitely going to affect every part of online communication. For instance,

...people use the prefix cyber- or e- to talk about online activity. The symbol @, traditionally used for e-mail addresses, is also commonly used as a universal link between recipient and address, regardless of whether or not the conversation takes place online. It also has come to be influential in non-Internet settings as a replacement for the word ‘at’. Other remarkable features of Netspeak that are used in everyday language are various types of abbreviations such as ‘cu’ for ‘see you’ or ‘LOL’ for ‘laughing out loud’. (Crystal 81-85)

Research in this area of communication is constantly witnessing new occurrences; it is continually emerging, shifting and overlapping. It has not just transformed structurally but added new facets to this discourse in terms of content and context e.g. Status update on Facebook and mobile apps are the good example to show shifts in contents, contexts and also overlaps between online and traditional language norms. According to Susan Herring, four broad levels of examination are taken into account (CMDA): Structure, Meaning, Interaction management, Social Phenomenon for online discourse analysis (Herring 4-6).

Herring’s levels of Computer-Mediated Discourse Analysis, not just proffer a method for broad-spectrum assessment of the language online, but also endow us with a framework for the research of Genderlect. The questions of Genderlect in this special environment have to be analyzed from a new, dynamic perspective. As said by Herring, “Internet linguistic is concerned with sometimes communicative features known from face-to-face interaction, but often completely different phenomena and methods than in speech and these have to be detected and analyzed” (Herring 4-6). The research of Genderlect, furthermore, aims to answer the question of how gender disparity persists in an anonymous medium which allegedly renders gender invisible. (Herring 2). Thus, grounding our analysis on these theories we will now analyze our texts based on this study.

3. Analysis

The aim of this study was to show shifting dynamics in cross cultural communication, we now analyze the question put forth by us in the beginning of this study-

- Is gendered language merged in us so firmly that we even reflect in typewritten format?
- Whether the shift is challenging the language norm?
- If yes, what are the intersection and parallels we find in the changing language template?

The Internet indisputably created an environment and presented an approach for gender to perform virtually, a trend which started with choosing nicknames and consequently, became the reason for gender construction in cyberspace to critically, access, observe and analyze. CMC blurs the gender distinction from biological "sex" and challenges the structure of traditional stereotypes. (Herring 2000; Rodino 2006).

In the text, only communication esp. online female users can pick gender neutral name in order to lessen stereotypical gender disparity or negative trolls. But since we are only analyzing what's app chat, participants here too have autonomy to acquire any name irrespective of their gender but since this is a mobile based application, information of users/participant is either saved in the phonebook (mobile no.) or can establish through other methods. While this type of communication has both advantages as well as disadvantages, the good side is, it recognises whether hidden or disclosed is not a cause of any kind of inconvenience in this platform, most of the participants are known to the administrator or recognized by other participants of the group but even in case of anonymity language itself divulges a lot of information about the user, people unconsciously give away lot of information in their discourse style. As said by Herring (in online communication) "...participants use neutral usernames, their written text alone is sufficient for detecting whether they are female or male". (Herring 2).

"Linguistic features like verbosity or the female politeness also signal gender in chats, blogs or forums". (Herring 2005) She further argues that "social phenomena such as gender styles seem most resistant to technological reshaping, perhaps because they exist at a higher level of abstraction and their expression is not bound to a specific communicative modality." (Herring 20-21).

George Yule too in his book The Study of Language pointed out these differences, he said, in general females communicate more personal feelings in their conversation, while men have their preferences for non-personal topics like sports, professional talks etc. They use the same language differently because, while women like to discuss domestic know how's, martial discourses, men either react in such discussions or give advice (Yule 1996:242). Men's language seems to be more aggressive in comparison to women's which is more passive, which answers our first question that we do provide information about our gendered self through our language even in typewritten form. The female rapport talk and male report talk can easily be pointed in the conversation, the female users, reported about their feelings and experience, apart from the common forwarded message, which finds a commonality across all the groups. On the other hand, male users also shared certain information, forwards and feeling of bromance or solidarity which by and large a common feature in both male and female conversation. The third group only shared information relevant to the subject area of their group apart from inspiring forward messages and wishes. There were also instances in all three groups where language changes from English to vernacular (code-switching) or a combination which is also a good area for further study.

In this entire course of study, we have found instances of gendered self in language and we also found intersections and shifts in these transcripts esp. in the usage of emoticons and length of the texts analyzed. We found that men, today have started using more visual (emoticons) to express their feeling/s in a given conversation which also helps in moderating social relationships. This usage gives an idea about growing parallels among gender: women seek connection, men seek status. Today there are 60 or more basic emotions (emoticons) offered by message system, they help in carrying some of the basic features of facial expression which can convey a positive or negative reaction instantly (the kinesics and proxemics), though their semantic role is limited. To get a better picture more group conversation needs to be analyzed for this purpose. 😊

Also, in this application mediated communication let's call it 'AMC'; turn-taking on screen is very different because it is dictated by software and not the participant (Crystal 238). In the traditional setting, it is impossible to converse with more than one or two people at a time. In online setting or AMC for instance in this study, people interact with messages from many participants in the same conversation, there may be several conversations on different topic simultaneously going on screen, participants respond to these messages depending upon their situation, interest, stimulus, and efficiency in typing but in non- virtual world this is merely an impossibility. Is this changing language norm by using the language differently? Yes, for a successful exchange/ interfacing, turn-taking is an essential component. It comes so naturally in any conversation, making speakers unaware of its presence like questions to be followed by answers, information by acknowledgment or complains about apology or excuses. These basic skills acquired at an early age makes a normal conversation. In a multi-users environment like in

'AMC' or online chat, messages arrive from diverse sources and routes leading to constant overlaps. Consequently, it also makes it a multi-author phenomenon which does not provide a greener territory for a male to seek status in such kind of conversation but different intention used in communication certainly influences our discourse style which by and large changes the entire language template. (Crystal 237-239)

Conclusion

With the advent of technology, humankind has been blessed with many offerings, which not just run parallel but also intersect at many junctures. The study of language and sexuality in a mediated environment like the application mediated communication (AMC) as proposed and discussed in this paper help gender to perform, contest and re-conceptualize virtually and dynamically, it distorts gender distinction, giving a new lens to challenge the existing structure of established stereotypes. In this paper we have discussed and analyzed what's app conversation of the three groups (group chats), we found that even though language is not innate yet we tend to give our proliferated gendered signatures, unintentionally in our everyday language use, the distinctive patterns give enough evidence, suggestions even in the absence of physical clues.

We also identified new shift emerging out of these mediated communications which are not just challenging but affecting and erecting traditional language norm. These evolving intersections in language are bringing change in the entire dynamics of communication and our traditionalist mindsets. The cellular environment used for the study is the new bountiful space for interlocutors to negotiate and evolve. These intersections and evolving shifts are mainly seen in the usage of emoticons and in lengths of conversation (text), both men and women are generously using these virtual facial denominators to bond and moderate their social relationships which are contrary to the earlier theory of women seek support, men seek status. These new age technological tools are helping us challenge earlier projections in language model and sexuality, bringing slow yet subsequent changes in the language template.

With this we conclude this paper; we have picked more questions in an attempt to answers the raised inquiry during the course of this study. We now aim for more serious empirical study in 'AMC' to look at the new manifesting changes in language template irrespective of gender. Even though this area is condemned for highlighting stereotypes yet revelation can bring new insights in language study, therefore Genderlect helps researchers re-define absolutism of speech ascribed by one's biological by scrutinizing the whole idea of gender construction in the absence of physical cues in such mediated environment. This paper can be quantified to prove our analysis.

Though this happens all the time, I think as I am growing older, I am seeing this more and more a psyche across the spectrum, not only in sports. 4/8/16, 23:56 - Saju: Here are some of Sam Bahadur's delicious quotes...

1. (At an officers' dinner) "Gentlemen, I must congratulate you. You have all kept alive the great tradition of your unit. Of marrying gorgeous ladies"
2. (allegedly on being asked by Indira Gandhi if he was planning a coup) "Not if you will be a good girl!"
3. (On being told that a jawan had his head shaved for sexual misconduct) "You idiot, he did not do it with his head"
4. (To Jagjit Singh Aurora) "You are the most boring officer I know. Your wife will tell a better story to your grandkids about how their grandpa created history. Ensure she sees you do it!"
5. (To the PM) "Will you like me to send my resignation on grounds of health- mental or physical?"
6. (On being told that Ariel Sharon had said he is good enough to command the Israeli army) "Takes one to know one. He is almost as good as me"
7. (On being asked what he discussed with the Chinese general just ahead of the '71 war) " I told him it isn't 1962. Attempting to cross the Himalayas will be a bad idea. Ask your pal Kissinger"

And my everlasting favorite

"A leader is one who has ambition for other people"

25/04/16, 8:29:48 AM: +91 XXXXXXXX43: A JUDGE OF THE GUJARAT HIGH COURT FACES IMPEACHMENT BY PARLIAMENT :

A distinguished Parsi judge of the Gujarat High Court, Justice J B Pardiwala made the following remarks in his recent judgement in Hardik Patel case on Reservations. Unfortunately our law makers are going to impeach him for this para. Let's see what he said and decide :

"If I am asked by any one to name two things, which has destroyed this country or rather, has not allowed the country, to progress in the right direction, then the same is, (i) Reservation and (ii) Corruption. It is very shameful for any citizen of this country to ask for reservation after 65 years of independence. When our Constitution was framed, it was understood that the reservation would remain for a period of 10 years, but unfortunately, it has continued even after 65 years of independence. The biggest threats, today, for the country is corruption. The countrymen should rise and fight against corruption at all levels, rather than shedding blood and indulging in violence for the reservation. The reservation has only played the role of an amoeboid monster sowing seeds of discord amongst the people. The importance of merit, in any society, cannot be understated.

One has to wonder why is he going to be impeached by MPs (mostly Congress MPs) .

(The MPs who signed the petition include Anand Sharma, Digvijay Singh, Ashwani Kumar, P L Punia, Rajeev Shukla, Oscar Fernandes, Ambika Soni, B K Hariprasad (all Congress), D Raja (CPI), K N Balagopal (CPI-M), Sharad Yadav (JD-U), S C Misra and Narinder Kumar Kashyap (BSP), Tiruchi Siva (DMK) and D P Tripathi (NCP)).

YOU DON'T HAVE TO CANDLE MARCH to SUPPORT THE JUDGE. Just SPREAD THE WORD BY SHARING THIS WITH YOUR WHATSAPP FRIENDS, IF YOU CAN. That's minimum we can do to SUPPORT the OUTSPOKEN JUDGE.

25/04/16, 9:14:43 AM: +91 XXXXXXXX33: Happy bday deepti ...have a blessed day n year ahead
