Silver Seeds and Rusty Weeds

J B Mulligan

The blades of spaceships filled the sky, lunging like bayonets toward the scattering stars. Below, the people watched and prayed and waited to die.
The anthems rang, then faded away.

Far down the corridor of years,
a spaceship plunged through an atmosphere,
dragging behind it a robe of debris,
some of which burned, some of which fell
like seeds and spores across the planet.

People emerged from the spaceship singing.
Some of them hauled out garbage bags
and mounded them beside the ship.
High on a hill, dark watchers stood loading their weapons, sharpening blades.

Bio: J B Mulligan has had poems and stories in well over one hundred magazines over the past 40 years, has had two chapbooks published: The Stations of the Cross and THIS WAY TO THE EGRESS, as well as 2 e-books, The City Of Now And Then, and A Book of Psalms. He has appeared in several anthologies, including Inside/Out: A Gathering Of Poets; The Irreal Reader (Cafe Irreal); and multiple volumes of Reflections on a Blue Planet.
